

IDEAS & DEBATE

OPINIONS | REVIEWS | ANALYSIS

18 Number of months it took commission looking into funding of higher education in SA

DISPUTES There are various legal instruments rich can use to ensure smooth succession upon their demise

Why Kenyans should be open to writing a will

SUCCESSION

WILLIAM MAEMA
Senior partner at Iseme, Kamau & Maema Advocates.
Email: wmaema@ikm.co.ke

Whenever a prominent Kenyan dies, especially if he was rich, his immediate family suffers a double portion of grief. In the first instance, because of the loss of the family patriarch and provider but more poignantly, the fear of the unwelcome but almost certain emergence from the woodworks of a swarm of claimants seeking a share of the estate.

Some of us are so steeped in superstition that we believe writing a will is like taunting death. Unfortunately, by failing to plan, we leave our immediate families with a myriad of problems that deny them the chance to enjoy the fruits of our labour. Intestacy is the legal term for the situation that arises when one dies without leaving a will. Intestacy may also occur where a person made a will, which is later invalidated by the court or he revoked the will but died before replacing it.

One may also die partially testate and partially intestate. This happens where a person's will covers some but not all of his assets, for example, those situated abroad where for legal reasons a Kenyan will may not take effect. It can also arise where the will lacks the omnibus clause 'all the assets of which I die possessed, wherever situate, anywhere in the world' to cover property acquired subsequent to the date of the will. In both cases, the assets falling outside the scope of the will are dealt with as if the owner died intestate.

When one dies intestate, the Law of Succession Act dictates how his property is to be distributed amongst his descendants including those who may be unknown to the immediate family. The law is clear that all the children of the deceased, whether male or female, legitimate or illegitimate, regardless of age, are entitled to a share of his estate. In this context, marriage is irrelevant. Indeed, contrary to common misconception, the beneficiary does not even need to be the biological child of the deceased in order to inherit. Any person acknowledged by the deceased as his child or dependant during his lifetime, whether sired by him or not, is entitled to inheritance.

Most of the succession battles pending in courts arise out of intestacy. The economic and social impact of succession litigation is huge. Such litigation paralyses the estate and leads to disintegration of family relationships. Usually, while the litigation is ongoing, all dealings in the estate are suspended to avoid what the Law of Succession Act calls the offence of 'intermeddling with the estate of a deceased person'. This is the story behind the many vacant plots and dilapidated buildings on prime locations in our towns and cities worth billions of shillings which have remained undeveloped for decades as the families engage in internecine wars over inheritance.

While estate planning does not guarantee the absence of family feuds over inheritance, it can, if done well, significantly reduce the possibility of their occurrence, foster harmony in the family, preserve the estate and unlock the value of the assets left behind.

The key to achieving stability in estate management is to ensure that everyone who by law is entitled to inherit, whether known or unknown to the immediate family, is adequately provided for. Section 26 of the Succession Act empowers any dependant who has not been provided for in the distribution of an estate to challenge such distribution in court. Many wills have been invalidated by the courts on this ground.

It should, however, be noted that adequate provision does not mean an equal share of the estate among all beneficiaries. There is no such requirement under the law and courts have affirmed that children who maintain a good relationship with their parents are justified to receive a greater share of the inheritance than those who do not.

Estate planning is broader than merely having or not having a will. It is a complex legal process which, in certain cases involves the expertise of various professionals such as lawyers, accountants, investment advisers, actuaries and even counsellors depending on the complexity of one's personal life and the vastness of the estate.

Various legal instruments have been devised over the centuries to help in estate planning. The will is the best known although it is not the only one. The Law of Succession Act confers upon any person of sound mind aged at least 18 to dispose of his property by will as he deems fit, subject only to making a reasonable provision for his dependants. One is thus free to dispose of property to any person, cause or charity as one wishes.

Trusts are another vehicle used in estate planning. Provided that the trust is well set up, the property transferred to it is automatically removed from the estate and can only be distributed to the beneficiaries named in the Trust Deed. Unfortunately, trusts are not very well understood in Kenya and the law on the subject is largely undeveloped.

Hopefully, the courts will seize the opportunity presented by the case of Albert Kigera Karume and two others versus the trustees of the Njenga Karume Trust and five others (2015) to definitively pronounce the efficacy and legal effect of trusts as viable instruments of estate planning in Kenya. Suffice to say that this is a very effective tool of estate planning, especially in the UK where Kenya has derived most of her laws.

Transfer of property inter-vivos (during one's lifetime) is another mechanism for estate planning. This may sound like free legal advice to those with dependants who, for any number of reasons, may not be named in a will. The downside, however, is that the process is irreversible and may lead to regrets if the beneficiary subsequently turns rogue or becomes greedy and starts demanding more.

In conclusion, the uncomfortable truth is that as Kenyan law stands today, children, whether born within or out of wedlock, are an integral part of their father's life and cannot be wished away either by him or his immediate family.

OTHER VOICES

JACOB ZUMA
South African President

Business Day, Editorial

It's not what one would call policy clarity. First, the Heher commission on the funding of higher education took more than 18 months to complete its work. Then President Jacob Zuma sat on the commission's report for almost two months, making it almost inevitable someone would leak it. The Presidency was working hard on reading the report, we were told in a media statement last week. Whether and when it will have the courage to come out with a plan of action remains to be seen.

KEVIN SPACEY
Disgraced American actor

Guardian, Owen Jones

How dare you, Kevin Spacey. One of the age-old tropes deployed against gay and bisexual men is that they pose a threat to children, that they are synonymous with paedophiles and pederasts. This vicious lie has long proved useful in justifying the systematic persecution of gay and bisexual men. And that is why Spacey's statement is so utterly contemptible. He has been accused of attempted sexual assault against actor Anthony Rapp, who was a 14-year-old child at the time. The Oscar winner denied any recollection of the incident - and then chose to take the opportunity to come out.

Hollywood scandal

MARINE LE PEN
French politician

New Vision, Dominique Moisi

Seven months ago, when Marine Le Pen of the far-right National Front had a chance of winning the French presidency, Germany feared for France's future. But after Germany's federal election in September, France has not been particularly afraid for its neighbour. The extreme-right Alternative für Deutschland, for all its gains, is not about to come to power. Germany, after all, is not Austria. Nevertheless, French and German elites have found a common cause for concern.

Most of the succession battles pending in courts arise out of intestacy"